They clearly had no interest in having sex with each other, there was definitely no passion, but the woman kept telling the man that he was so wonderful. He never really responded to her and the whole thing was awkward. We did get to know each other, I found out that he was a lawyer at a large firm in LA. He was attractive, smart and seemingly kind. The day before my flight back home I hadn't heard from him and I wasn't sure what to do. I had already booked my flight home and had no intention of checking in at this point. Then he showed up at the airport and I was so shocked, and at the same time happy to see him. He was reading a book and he told me that he also had a flight to catch. I said that I was leaving in about five minutes but we could go ahead and give it a try, so we did. I was very relaxed the whole time. It was like the perfect date. I had been on so many of those where I didn't find myself relaxed at all, more often than not I was either nervous or just had no ideas what to do. This date had an incredible feeling all the way through. Later we went to a really nice restaurant for dinner and he told me that his life was not the way that he wanted it to be. He was going through a divorce from a really nice woman and he was missing her. We both had a really good time that night. The next day he flew back to LA. I called him three days later and we have been together since. He really cares about me and treats me really well.The perfect profession for a writer Naomi Wuest's choice to become a science fiction author was her initial one. "My first experience with writing was in grade school. I was in a comic book club, and we'd go to school on a Saturday and go to the local comic book store. I would draw all the comics I liked. After that I wrote for a small newsletter." But it wasn't until a program on KQED about what is the perfect profession for people that she was re-inspired to begin to write for a career. ♦
